The Rossier School of Education at the University of Southern California is seeking a senior leader in Educational Psychology and Learning Sciences for a tenured full professor position. The specific research area of interest is open, however candidates with the following interests are particularly encouraged to apply: learning and motivation, STEM learning, and digital media learning environments. The candidates should have strong record of securing external funding. This position may also be eligible for an appointment as the Stephen H. Crocker Professorship in Education.

The focus of the Educational Psychology concentration in the Rossier School of Education is on learning, motivation, instructional technology, assessment and mental health issues in urban education. Faculty expertise in this broad area includes school counseling, learning and motivation, issues relating to digital access and literacy in urban education environments, performance assessment, social and emotional learning, neuroscience of emotion, self-regulation, and social and cultural influences on the classroom.

The successful candidate will join a faculty and students who are committed to using psychological research to impact and improve the lives, opportunities, and educational experiences of urban students.

Applicants should provide a letter of interest, curriculum vitae, a publication or representative writing sample, and contact information for three references.
